Section 3: Hard

26. Janner's death as Throne Warden is the emotional climax of the saga. What does his sacrifice most powerfully illustrate?

- A. That every war demands the lives of the innocent
- B. That older brothers are always meant to serve younger ones
- C. That self-giving love — laying down your life for another — is the highest calling
- D. That a king cannot rule without his warden to keep him alive

27. The Maker is portrayed as a loving creator who allows suffering for a greater purpose. What real-world idea does this most closely reflect?

- A. The idea that God remains completely absent from human suffering
- B. Providence — the belief that a loving God works through pain toward redemption
- C. The idea that evil itself originally came from the Maker's own hands
- D. Fate, an unstoppable force that no person or god can change or redirect

28. Kalmar begins the series as a curious boy named Tink and ends as the Wolf King saved by his brother's sacrifice. What does his arc say about sin and redemption?

- A. Sin changes a person permanently and can never truly be undone
- B. Redemption often requires someone else's sacrifice — we cannot always save ourselves
- C. Adventure always leads to consequences that ruin the people around us
- D. Those born into royal families are inherently more valuable and deserving of rescue

29. The Wingfeather Saga traces a family's journey through exile, transformation, loss, and restoration. What larger story does Peterson seem to be retelling?

- A. A political warning about the dangers of monarchy and royal power
- B. A coming-of-age story about growing up and leaving childhood behind
- C. A family drama centered on sibling rivalry and competition
- D. The story of humanity's fall, exile, and redemption through sacrificial love

30. In the final book, Leeli's song proves to be as powerful as any sword. What does this suggest about art and beauty in the face of darkness?

- A. Art and music are purely for entertainment and hold no real power against evil
- B. Only physical strength and sharp weapons can defeat a truly powerful enemy
- C. Music belongs only in peaceful times and has no place on a battlefield
- D. Art and beauty are weapons of truth that can break the power of lies
